However if one only has non-exact data, one can extrapolate the mean value from the available data set. The way I would suggest to fix your data is to add binomially distributed noise, say for example +5 to the measured data (eg. for the left axis on the plot above). Add these errors in the form of normally distributed random values to the measured data points. For the light blue points use the added data to calculate an average data point value. The problem with the non-exact data is that there are many more sampling points than the available data points. For example the data points you have at the extremes on the right of your graph will have more sampling points than the left. If you make your data points to represent two data points, the left one may still have less sampling points than the right. If you don't add a scaling term, you will not get your measure
