Q: Memory leak when using Java BigInteger in Android App We're using the BigInteger class in our Android app. It's so efficient that even a very modest sized number leads to an OutOfMemoryError before the process aborts itself. What surprises me is that this issue seems to be specific to Android, i.e. with the JVM version on my Android phone. When a BigInteger is called in our app, the memory usage never drops to the level that it will be killed by the OS. On my phone this occurs for example at 1.5 million. On desktop I can get it to crash without having used half a million. Is this typical memory leak behavior or have we stumbled into a bug in the BigInteger implementation? (The problem seems to go away if we write our own wrapper class around BigInteger, e.g. creating a new class that extends BigInteger but initializing it using the constructor that takes a long.) A: Never trust the JVM to do anything without a specific reason. Is this typical memory leak behavior or have we stumbled into a bug in the BigInteger implementation? It's an extremely unlikely bug in the BigInteger implementation, you must have done something wrong. Do you get the same results when using the primitive long? The is the same data type and implementation as long so this should not give you the same results. @Phil Karlton from sun gave the reason (or in this case: gave the most stupid reason) to use the BigInteger data type in Java: BigInteger is about as compact as it gets when it comes to the data type. You certainly cannot beat it in terms of performance, all you have to do is call valueOf(long) and you get it done. and if this data type has such a good performance and you can not beat it with another data type, why use it at all? Do you have a suitable multi-threading model in your program that allows for other threads than the main thread to access/change the data of the BigInteger? That's the real reason for it not to be as responsive as if you use the long data type. I never ever seen this kind of problems when using the long data type. This link with some benchmark might give you some insight about it:

What's New In?

On February 24, a man named David Wilson allegedly shot and killed a 12-year-old boy named Traylon Gaston as he sat on a bus near the intersection of Spring Avenue and Thomas Avenue in East St. Louis. The victim had been playing with some friends when he was shot multiple times. According to authorities, the suspect was at the location with a .25-caliber handgun when he approached the boy and fired the gun. The gunshot victim, who was a friend of the suspect, died at the scene. No one else was injured. Q: What is the verb for the opposite of forget? I know forget means to no longer remember something, but is there a verb for the opposite of that? For example, She forgot her birthday. Is it: She remembered her birthday. A: The verb is remember. From the Longman Dictionary of Contemporary English by David Crystal: remember [WITH OBJECT] To be aware of something in the past or to recall something about it. He was so drunk that he was almost completely 'remembering' Noun A visual or mental image of someone or something. She 'remembers' many things about her childhood. The Cambridge Dictionary A: I suppose you could say that she "refrained from forgetting", but I don't think that works as naturally. She refrained from forgetting her birthday. or She reminded herself to remember her birthday. Q: How can I use WindowApplication directly in ASP.Net MVC app In my case, the user is not using Internet Explorer. So all I need is to do is to create a Generic Html Helper or some other thing that would help me to output HTML(with and all other tags) But the problem is that how can I use the Window.open() method directly in ASP.NET MVC. I want to do something like
