Zoledronic acid (ZOL), a potent bisphosphonate, has been shown to be effective in the treatment of osteoporosis and postmenopausal osteoporosis. Furthermore, it has been recently demonstrated that ZOL treatment leads to a significant increase of sperm motility. The aim of the study was to evaluate the effect of ZOL in in androgenetic uterine factor infertility (AUI), a pathology in which women show a severe azoospermia secondary to an obstruction at the uterine level. This retrospective study was performed in women diagnosed with AUI and treated with ZOL. Twelve consecutive women with AUI treated with ZOL for at least 6 months were enrolled. Before and after treatment, all patients underwent clinical examination, hormonal assay and spermiogram. In addition, 17beta-estradiol (E2) and follicle-stimulating hormone (FSH) serum levels were measured. Patients had a significant increase in sperm motility, although improvements were only noted at the 2-month time point and for the percentage of sperm with progressive motility. After 2 months, ZOL therapy was interrupted. Despite not observing a significant decrease in hormone serum levels, no hormonal side effects were reported. Overall, the results of this study suggest that, in cases of AUI not responsive to in vitro fertilization treatment, ZOL therapy could be a valid and safe therapeutic option to improve spermiogram parameters.
