The haematological and serum biochemical findings of 80 patients with alcoholic liver disease and pancreatitis are reported. Patients with alcohol-induced liver disease were divided into two groups according to whether they had concomitant acute pancreatitis (group I) or not (group II). From this, a retrospective analysis was made of the prevalence of the haematological and serum biochemical abnormalities in the two patient groups, and the possible relationship between the two abnormalities and the duration of alcohol abuse. In the patient group with concomitant pancreatitis there was a significantly greater prevalence of leucocytosis, granulocytosis, elevated total serum alkaline phosphatase levels, reduced serum albumin concentrations, and a tendency for increased serum bilir c6a93da74d
