Using Advantix 3D Crack Map Data to Create Better and More Cost-Effective Safety Mitigation on Paved Surfaces Authors: Nace S.Vora, Gianfranco Donfrancesco, James E.R. Bozzelli (Department of Civil Engineering and Geological Engineering, University of Waterloo, Waterloo, Canada) Abstract: This article demonstrates that laser profiling technologies can provide high-quality near-surface elevation (NSHE) data across road surfaces, such that the data can be used to estimate the textural height of a given surface area. The NSHE data are used to determine what is included as geometric or surface area grade, and were compared to the status quo approach of using a GPS survey. The Advantix 3D data were chosen due to their close proximity and large number of available data points, allowing us to generate digital surface models (DSMs) suitable for impact modeling. These DSMs were then subdivided into smaller segments (Road Grades) and inspected for height. The results were compared to the geographic gradings. It was found that Advantix yielded a higher proportion of elevations within the targeted grading of 1 to 4 in all cases.
