To be honest, however, I find Touch pretty slow to work with. The interface is refreshing, and I like how I see the app respond to my actions pretty well. However, Photoshop Touch is just not quite as fast as Lightroom or Photoshop. This is not really surprising. What is surprising is the slowness with which certain tools work. That is hardly the fault of Touch, but of the developers. There is also the usual issue of design-by-hand and paper presentation, as against design-by-interface and touch-optimised designs. It is not the case that I dislike Touch, but I am sure that Adobe will need to make some serious improvements because of this. Now, let us move finally into Apple's iPad Pro. So far, I have been using it for a while, but not much has changed. I still find it very pleasant to work with. It feels like a more dedicated workstation than the first iPad Pro, and I cannot really complain about that. I do believe there is some room for improvement, though; otherwise the device would not be worth the price of admission. The screen is great but that does not solve a lot. If the iPad Pro with the Pencil were made for serious work only, it would be an interesting product. The glaring thing about the iPad Pro, though, is that it is a very well thought out, very nicely made device, but the price is ridiculously high. This comes despite the success of the first model, the iPad Air, with its lower priced but equally nicely crafted sibling, the iPad Air 2. The hardware is fast, sturdy and light at the same time, and I am impressed by that. What I am not impressed by very much are the performance issues. I have encountered two of these, and they are really quite major, so I am thinking one of them must be a bug in the software.

There are many ways to organize your photos, and Lightroom excels in providing a collection of these different methods. Here, the panel on the far left (seen in the screenshot above) presents thumbnails of your entire collection in a hierarchical order. The window on that panel provides a sub-panel, which shows the image thumbnails arranged by person. The next panel, which appears on the right, is the Metadata panel. This is a collection of tabs that provide the image's creation and rating information. The tabs are organized by media stream. Each media stream is categorized by the original application its captured in, as shown in the screenshot below.
